I MUST BE A DESCENDANT OF PRINCES AND HEROES! HOW ELSE COULD I HAVE ACTED SO PRINCELY AND HEROIC TODAY?

OHHH! WHAT AN UP-STUCK DUCK!

I'M GOING TO SETTLE THIS ONCE AND FOR ALL BY DOING A BIG RESEARCH JOB AND LOOKING UP DONALD'S REAL FAMILY TREE!

A FEW DAYS LATER...

LUDWIG! WHAT'S ALL OF THAT?

THIS IS YOUR FAMILY TREE! AND A TREE LIKE TH.S ISN'T ONE YOU'D ENTER IN A PLANT SHOW!

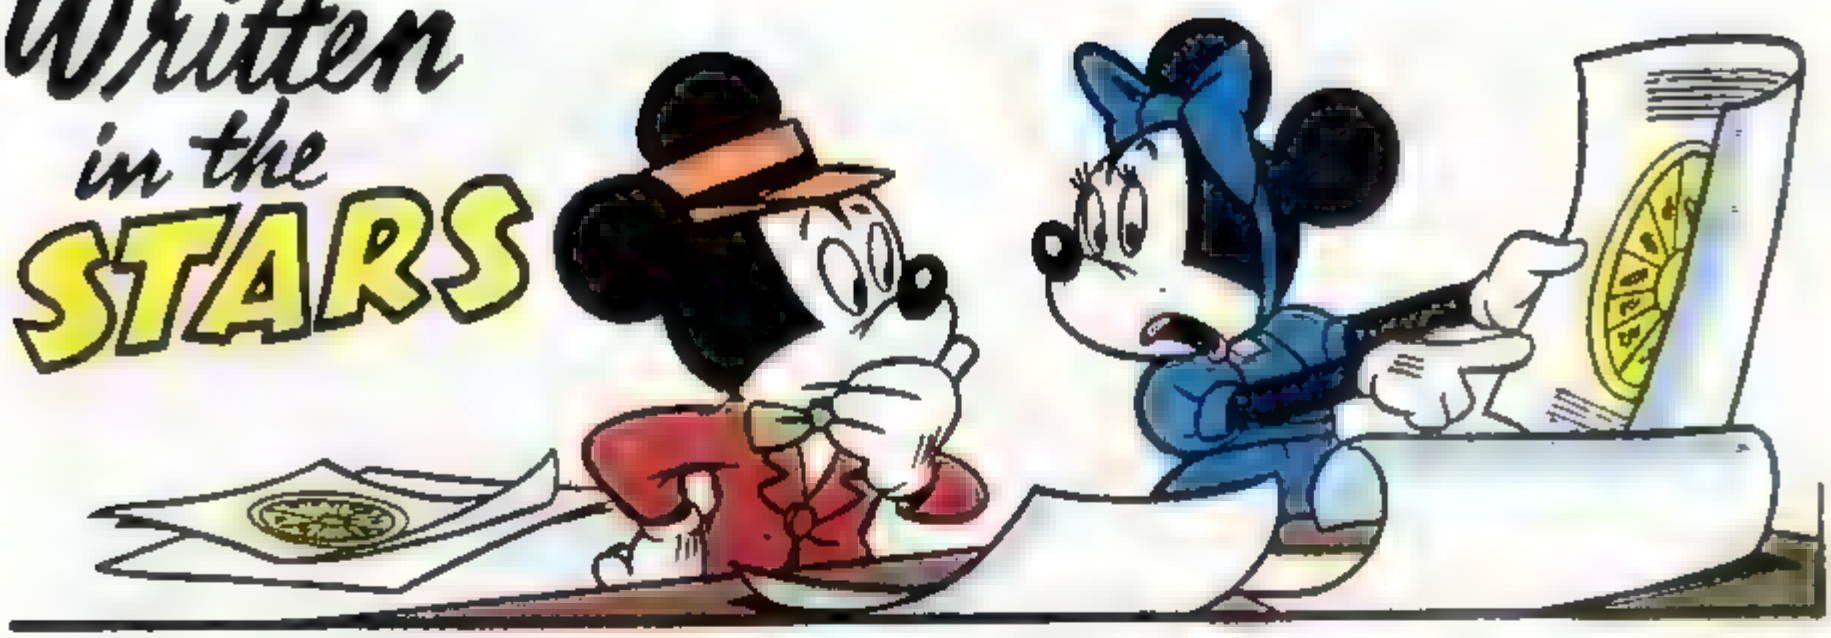
Written in the STARS



"No, Boys," Mickey Mouse explained to his nephews, Morty and Ferdie, "it's too nice a day to sit inside a dark movie theater. You should be out exercising and enjoying the fresh air and sunshine."

"But gee, Uncle Mickey! It's a cowboy movie," Morty pleaded.

"It's a spectacular! All the biggest cowboy stars are going to be in it," Ferdie added.

"I don't care about stars," Mickey answered firmly. "Let's go skating at the new Roller Bowl. We'll walk over and ask Minnie to go along with us."

Morty and Ferdie got their skates, but they followed Mickey down the street rather unhappily.

"You boys wait outside. I'll only be a minute," Mickey said when they reached Minnie's front door.

Morty and Ferdie sat down on the steps to wait while Mickey went inside.

"Hi, Minnie! I've come to take you roller skating," he called. "Hey, where are you?" he called again, looking around the room.

"Over here. At the table," Minnie replied.

"Golly, no wonder I couldn't see you. Why are you hiding behind those old papers?" he asked.

"These aren't just 'old papers.' They are my charts of the stars," Minnie retorted indignantly. "Professor Horace Scope, the famous astrologer, made them out for me so that I can learn to tell the future by the stars."

"Don't tell me you believe in that stuff?" Mickey scoffed.

"Of course I do. It's very scientific," she answered, showing Mickey her charts and diagrams. "According to the date of my birth and the position of the stars and planets, I can forecast my plans for each day.

"I could even forecast your future for today," she said, starting at once to read the charts for Mickey, according to his stars.

"Never mind that now," Mickey grumbled. "Come on and go roller skating with us. Morty and Ferdie are waiting outside."

"Oh, Mickey," Minnie cried excitedly, "according to your stars, this would be a very bad day for you to go skating. See here," she pointed to the moons and stars on her charts.

"You'd better do something else. Your horoscope shows that you should stay indoors today. Why not take Morty and Ferdie to the movies? There's a good cowboy film at the corner theater."

"You, too?" Mickey groaned. "That's all I've been hearing from the boys. No siree! I'm going skating today," he declared, as he rushed out the door.

Not looking where he was going, in his determination to get there, the next thing Mickey knew, he was flat on his back.

Morty and Ferdie had tired of waiting and had run off to play hide-and-seek. But they had carelessly and thoughtlessly left their skates on the steps. When Mickey stepped on them, he went "skating" down the stairs with a thumpity bang.

Inside the house, Minnie heard the commotion and came running out to see what it was all about. Mickey, sprawled on the sidewalk, grinned up at her sheepishly.

"I told you I was going skating," he chuckled. "But, on second thought, maybe we had better go to the movies. As you said, 'It's written in the stars'."
